So what's the story on this place?

In the fall of 1890, Dr. Jack arrived in Kensington. He had landed in the port of Charlottetown on a steamer from London and had arranged to spend the winter with a local business man in Kensington.

The next spring, Dr. Jack hired a crew to start construction of his new home. He was lonely for the old world charms of London, instructing builders to recreate a Tudor style manor. When completed it housed the doctor's practice and a well needed Inn for the town.

Before long, visitors were coming from all over the Maritimes and the New England states to stay at Whitechapel, Dr. Jack's mansion. It was rumored that he could cure all sorts of ailments; people begged to be involved in his experiments, residing in the inn and enjoying the splendor of his gardens.

His guests were mostly travelers coming for a short stay and gone again. It wasn't until the disappearance of his assistant, Dr. Eugene Splicer, sometime between 1929 and 1930, that people first became suspicious as to what was really going on inside the walls of Whitechapel. This unexplained disappearance prompted an investigation by Kensington's finest.

The findings of the investigation were inconclusive. Kensington Town Police felt that perhaps Dr. Splicer had moved on to greener pastures as visitation to the Dr.'s Inn had slowed with the tough economic times of what would become the Great Depression.

A bit of a pioneer in the area of health, Dr. Jack may have been responsible for the first blood bank in Atlantic Canada. During the years of the second world war he opened his doors promoting blood donation and collection.

Dr. Jack was seen less around town, keeping to himself, always buried in his work. Although we can't be certain of his age, by this time he should have been getting to a respectable old age, but reports suggest that he aged very well.

Visitations to the inn slowed over the years and following a devastating ice storm in 1956, the inn finally closed after losing power for a prolonged period and being badly damaged. It is unclear what ever happened to Dr. Jack. He vanished from record sometime later and the property changed hands and underwent several renovations over the years.

A number of attempts to reopen the Inn under new management failed. In one case it was due to an unexplained 'accident', others claimed the place was haunted by the patients of Dr. Jack or Dr. Jack himself!

The current owners have decided not to hide the murky history any longer. In the latest attempt to revive the old building, owners have tried to capitalize on Dr. Jack's mystery. In 2001, 110 years after Dr. Jack began construction on the building, the first annual Halloween - Nights of Fear was held and Islanders flocked to the Mansion again after all those years. In 2005, during a renovation, workers uncovered some of Dr. Jack's own surgical tools, some disturbing notes containing arcane symbols and assorted bones. There was too much information now to ignore the truth.

In June of 2006 the Haunted Mansion opened to the public in its full glory. There have been more discoveries and unexplained occurrences that need to be shared, to be revealed to all!

Take a walk through yourself and make up your own mind, but don't call us in the middle of the night if you can't sleep. Phone a friend, call an ex.
